

WATER WORKS

TV is indeed the drug of our nation. In fact, we're so obsessed with it, that we can't even visit the bathroom without its comforting glow in the background. Which explains the growing demand for sets which can withstand a good soaking. Envirovision made waves with the release of its 17-inch digital waterproof TV and have now come up with the world's first HD ready 19-inch Freeview, waterproof model for use in the bathroom.

The 19EA comes with top notch waterproof ceiling speakers, whilst the 191A has its own integral speakers. Both are packed with all the techie goodness you'd expect these days such as a seven day TV guide, digital and conventional teletext and a water resistant remote control.

Easily installed flush against the wall, you need never choose between taking a bath and watching your favourite show again.

DROP EVERYTHING

Am I getting older or is everything in the world getting smaller? I can remember the days of old record players with huge speakers that could crush a car. These days you'd be surprised if they stun a mouse.

At only 22cm in width and weighing a paltry 2.5kg The Drop from Podspeakers, is no more than a featherweight, but the sound is anything but. It is carefully crafted in the smooth shape of – you guessed it – a water droplet, sculpted to mimic free flowing organic forms of nature. Not only does it look great, but the sound isn't too dusty either and with the ability to be mounted on the ceiling, wall or left free standing you can easily mould it to look like whatever you desire.
